Wisconsin Republican state legislators approved an audit of the state's 2020 presidential election results, to begin in the coming weeks. Former state Supreme Court Justice Michael Gableman was appointed to oversee the investigation of the election results.

Michael Gableman traveled to Sioux Falls, SD to attend MyPillow CEO Mike Lindell's cyber symposium on election integrity in August.

Gableman traveled to Arizona last month to learn about their election audit and how it could be useful in Wisconsin.

"I learned a lot there that will be helpful to my investigation," said Gableman, who also attended the election fraud symposium led by MyPillow CEO Mike Lindell in Sioux Falls, South Dakota last month.

Gableman's investigation is one of several in the state of Wisconsin. The nonpartisan Legislative Audit Bureau is reviewing the results of last year's election. Republican State Rep. Janel Brandtjen, chairwoman of the Assembly Elections Committee, issued subpoenas to election clerks in Brown and Milwaukee counties for voting machines and ballots.

President Donald Trump issued a statement calling Brandtjen a "strong and great leader."

"All eyes are on Wisconsin as they begin their election audit," said Trump. "Hopefully Republican Speaker Robin Vos has the integrity and strength Wisconsin needs to support Rep. Brandtjen's efforts. Our Country is counting on it!"

Legislative attorneys have stated that election subpoenas are not valid unless Republican Speaker Robin Vos signs them.

Vos replied saying that if Gableman believes that subpoenas are necessary, "we will look into making sure those can happen."

Republicans have attempted to change voting laws in Wisconsin since last year, but their efforts have been vetoed by Gov. Tony Evers, D-Wis. Evers vetoed legislation last month that would have required residents that vote absentee to provide ID.

Joe Biden was projected as the narrow winner of Wisconsin's 10 electoral votes for the 2020 presidential election after securing the state by less than one percent of votes.
